Sc A hole is made in the ground, and a certain line drawn, called a strand, behind which the players must take their stations. The object is, at this distance, to throw the bowl into the hole. He who does this most freq wins the game. It is now more gen called 'the Hole,' but the old designation is not yet quite extinct (JAM) Bnf Still played under the name of kypie hole. A paper cap is placed over the hole (WC) Abd The bool game of 'kypie' is played from a 'stance' about 12 feet from the kype or hole. The first player tries to hit one of his neighbours' bools, removing it a foot from its place. He then proceeds to hit any other, each hit being carefully noted, or he may play into the kype and hit them over again. If he miss the kype, two begins to play, hitting as many as he can. The boy whose marble gets hit six times leaves the game (GW) Ags Three holes are made at equal distances. He who can first strike his bowl into each of these holes, thrice in succession, wins the game. It is called 'capie-hole,' or by abbreviation 'capie' (JAM)

sent to one of my men servants, who thereupon bored a hole in the tree, placed the hair in the hole, and fastened it in with a plug, Chs² We have several curious recipes for it—roast hedgehog, fried mice, &c Another is holding a toad to the mouth, which is supposed to extract the cough from the patient This, however, does not seem infallible, as an old woman complained that 'her boy could not get shut of the chin cough, though he had sucked two toads to death' s Chs¹ Ching kof Stf Find a briar growing in the ground at both ends, pass the child under and over it nine times, for three mornings, before sunrise, repeating 'Under the briar, and over the briar, I wish to leave the chin-cough here' The briar must be cut, and made into the form of a cross, and worn on the breast, POOLE Customs, 37, in NORTHALL Gl „Stf¹ nw Der¹, Not³ Lin Iussis sicca et vehemens pueris frequens, SKINNER (1671) n Lin¹, Lei¹, Nhp¹, War², w Wor¹ Shr At Whittington the remedy is to pass the child three times under and three times over a briar which simply grows out from the hedge, saying meanwhile, 'Over the briar, and under the briar, and out goes the chin-cough' Usually a briar of which the root grows in one parish, while the end hangs over into another, is prescribed If the further end have rooted, so much the better At Market Drayton, which stands close to the boundaries of Shr, Stf, and Chs, a briar which grows in three counties is required (See whole chap, Superstitious Cures), BURNE Flk Lore (1883) 195, Shr¹ Chin ku't Hrf², Glo¹, Wil¹

CLAVIE, sb. Sc. [klē-vi.] In connexion with the ceremony of 'burning the clavie,' see below.

Elg. A superstitious ceremony is annually observed on New Year's Eve at the fishing village of Burghead on the Moray Frith, with the view of securing a good season's fishing. The clavie consists of a tar barrel, within which a fir prop about 4 ft. in length is fixed, surmounted by the staves of a herring cask (JAM. Suppl.); The ancient custom of burning the 'clavie,' or ridding the town of witches, was celebrated on 'Auld Yule E'en.' Throughout the evening the building of the crucible was going on, and by six o'clock, the hour for setting the material alight, everything was in readiness. The fire was lit, and the usual circle march was commenced. After parading round the fish-curing yards and through the main streets, the 'clavie,' accompanied by a large crowd of both old and young, was carried to the Doorie Hill, where the remains of the burning mass were duly deposited on the stone receptacle built for the purpose. There it was allowed to burn nearly down, after which the stack was sold to one of the hotel-keepers. The proceeds were disbursed in a 'wee drap' The custom of burning the 'clavie' is nowadays almost extinct, apart from its celebration at Burghead, and, it is said, at a small village in Wales, Aberdeen Whly. Free Press (Jan. 16, 1897).

(1) w.Som.¹ A very curious old custom, of the nature of a practical joke, is observed in the Hill district. On the night before Shrove Tuesday, if the backdoor or any outer door of the Parsonage or a farm-house be left unfastened, it is quietly opened, and before any one can stir to prevent it, a whole sack-full of broken bits of crockery is suddenly shot out in the middle of the kitchen, or wherever the bearer can penetrate before he is observed. He then decamps and disappears in the darkness, generally unrecognized. People are of course apt to forget the custom at the right moment, and so have their houses half filled with rubbish which it must have taken much pains to collect, and prepare secretly, beforehand. I have failed to discover either the origin or meaning of this custom, called 'drowin o' cloam'; but it is evidently allied to one practised in this neighbourhood on the same night—that of throwing a handful of stones at the door . . . The custom of throwing old clome on the Monday night before Shrove Tuesday is still continued in Hawkrudge. The words they say when it is thrown at the door or inside the house are—'Tipety, Tipety Tin, give me a pancake, And I will come in; Tipety, Tipety Toe, give me a pancake, And I will go.' The young men that are in the house (if there are any) rush out and try to collar the invaders, and if they are successful in their catch, they bring the prey inside and black his face with soot. After that they give him a pancake. nw.Dev.¹ In the evening of Pancake Day the boys go about the village throwing sherds at the doors and singing in a monotonous drawl the rhyme—'Flish, flash; flish, flash; Watter, watter, ling. Hev ee any pancakes? Plaize vor let us in. Hev ee any best beer? Hev ee any small? Plaize vor gee us zomthin' Or nothin' at all.' Of course the object of the boys is to get something given to them—pancakes, beer, or money. (2) w.Som.¹ Tūc'vau'n u arm'teen u tloam [too fond of emptying o' cloam]. Cor. In Macclesfield it is only the cotton hands who wear them. The sole of a clog is about an inch thick; a groove is cut entirely round it, and in this the upper leather is nailed. It is then tipped underneath with iron and has an iron heel, and it becomes a most formidable weapon for 'punsing' in a Lan. 'up and down' fight. Clogs are generally made considerably too large, and a wisp of straw or hay is placed under the sole of the foot. They are tied with a thong, or frequently have brass clasps; they are warm and comfortable, and are almost impervious to wet. The cutting of clog soles is quite a special branch of industry; Chs.², nw Der.¹, n.Lin.¹, War. (J.R.W.), War.², Shr.¹ Glo. BAYLIS Illus. Dial. (1870).

Snags* (1818) 18; Nhb.¹ The coble is built with a very deep cutwater, but towards the stern, which is square, it is made with a widening flat bottom. It is thus a boat without a 'keel,' but the flat bottom has two bilge clogs, called a 'skirval.' As the after-part draws only a few inches, the rudder is carried down much below the level of the bottom. These peculiarities necessitate the coble to be towed stern foremost, or, when landed, to be in like manner turned stern to the beach, and at the same time the rudder has to be unshipped. Dur. They're forc'd to take a coble, and come in by the sea, Bishopbruk Garl (1834) 52. n Yks.^{1,2} Used also as a pleasure-boat ne. Yks.¹, w Yks.⁵, e An.¹, Nrf.¹

1. A game played by children; see below.

Wm. My grandy's seeke And like to dee, And I'll make her Some cocklety bread, &c., BRAND Pop. Ant. (ed. 1849) II. 414. n.Yks.² The term Cocklety is heard among our children at play. One of them squats on its haunches with the hands joined beneath the thighs, and being lifted by a couple of others who have hold by the bowed arms, it is swung forwards and backwards and bumped on the ground or against the wall, while continuing the words 'this is the way we make cocklety bread.' e.Yks.¹ This term is quite obs. except in the well-known rhyme, used in a girls' game. A girl sits on two clasped hands of two other girls, the other united hands supporting her back, and is swung to and fro, the rhyme being repeated by the swingers, MS. add. (T.H.) w.Yks. The moulding cocklety bread is a sport among hoydenish girls not quite extinct. It consists in sitting on the ground, raising the knees and clasping them with the hands; and then using an undulatory motion as if they were kneading dough, accompanying the motion with a chant, of which the following are the words:— 'My granny is sick, and now is dead, And we'll go mould some cocklety bread; Up with the heels and down with the head, And that is the way to make cocklety bread.' Dough, thus moulded, when baked was given as a love charm, Sheffield Indep. (1874); w.Yks.² n.Lin.¹ The children turn head-over-heels after repeating the third line. Oxf. The maids when they have put themselves into the fit posture say thus— 'My granny is sick and now is dead, We'll go mould some cockle-bread,' AUBREY Remains (1697) in GOMME Games (1894) 74. Wil. A wanton sport, which they call moulding of cockle-bread; they gett upon a table-board, and then gather-up their knees and their coates with their hands as high as they can, and then they wabble to and fro with their buttocks as if they were kneading of dough, ib. ['Mounting cockeldy bread' is a play among children in which one lies down on the floor on her back rolling backwards and forwards, and repeating 'Cockeldy bread, mistley cake, When you do that for our sake,' Times (1847) in BRAND l.c.]

2. In phr. to make cockle-bread, to turn head over heels on a bed. Cor.¹²

(1) n.Yks. (I.W.) (2) n.Lin.¹ (3) N.I.¹ Called also the Devil's Coachman (4) w.Som.¹ When the tallow or stearine of a candle runs down on one side it often projects and then reunites to the candle, forming a sort of loop; this is a coffin-handle, and is a 'sure sign of death' to the person in whose direction it forms itself. The same superstition holds when the grease merely forms a considerable projection; it is then a 'winding sheet,' and being commoner is not so much dreaded as a coffin-handle. I have seen people turn a candle when it seemed inclined to form a winding-sheet in their direction. (5) Nhb. That sic unseetly coffin-kists Sud niver run doon giffin', Wilson Captains (1843) 112. COGGESHALL JOB, phr. Ess. A stupid piece of work; a foolish action.

The prov stupidity of the people of Coggeshall is the subject of many stories. Tradition says that when they had built their church, they found that they had forgotten to make any windows. So they got some hampers, and set them open in the sun to catch the light, shut them up tight, and took them into the church on wheelbarrows, and there opened them to let the light out. Another legend says that the people thought that their church was in the wrong place. In order to move it, they went to one end to push it, laying their coats down on the ground, outside the opposite end, on the spot to which the wall was to be removed. When they judged that they had moved the building far enough, they went round to find their coats, but none were to be found. Then they said that no doubt they had pushed the wall over them, so they went to look inside the church, but alas! they were not there. The Coggeshall men were short of stature, and on one occasion in hay-time it happened that the handles of their hayforks were all too long for them. What should they do? Of course if the handles were too short, it would be very easy to join a piece on to them; but what to do with these they knew not. It is related of these people that they put up hurdles to keep the floods out (S.P.H.).

12. To make a new-comer pay his footing.

new tenants are colted the first time they appear at the rent dinner. On the Mobberley Hall Estate, where I have received the rents for many years, and probably at other rent dinners, a curious formula is practised. After dinner two of the oldest tenants mysteriously leave their seats and go out of the room. They presently return bringing with them a carving knife, a rolling pin, and a small tea tray. They then go round the room looking the guests over till they find a new tenant, then begins the fun. They treat him as if he were a colt that is going to have his tail docked. They pat him on the back and shout wo-ho! wo-ho! and ask one another 'How will he stand it?' 'Dun yo think he'll bleed pretty well?' and so on. After a few of these jokes and 'by-play, and a good deal of laughing, the carving knife and the rolling pin are struck smartly together behind the man's back, which represents the docking of his tail, and the tray is presented to him, on which he is expected to deposit a piece of money, which is afterwards spent in punch. All the new people have to pass through the ordeal until there are no more colts. Nhp.² The ceremony consists in holding up his leg and striking the sole of his foot with a board. Glo.¹ He is colted. 5. The furrow slice or strip of ground turned up by the plough.

Hrt. Plowing the land across in hacks or combs, ELLIS Mod. Husb. (1750) IV. 1. Suf. (F.H.) w.Som.¹ In trenching or digging soil before winter, or in ploughing land for a fallow, a good workman tries to leave the sods as rough and uneven as possible, so as to allow the frost the better to penetrate and pulverize the surface. This is called leaving 'a good comb upon it.' So also in plastering a ceiling, it is desirable that the mortar should penetrate well between the laths, so as to leave as rough a surface as possible above them. This is called making a good comb Cor. The gruter Would hardly turn the coam, THOMAS Randigal Rhymes (1895) 26; Cor.³

Hence (1) Combing, vbl. sb. a shallow kind of ploughing; (2) Comb-ing-sull, sb. a plough made with two 'broad-sides,' so arranged as to throw up a 'comb' or ridge on each side; (3) Comb-vore, sb. a furrow; see below.

(1) Hrt. Made by the plough's being drawn forward and backward (somewhat closely), ELLIS Mod. Husb. (1750). Cor.³ (2) w.Som.¹ Koa'meen zoo'ul. Called also a 'Taty-zull,' and in some districts a ridging-plough. Much used for earthing up potatoes. (3) Dev. The comb vore is the last solid one, and is gen. much smaller than any of the preceding ones. The comb vore and all vore are both ploughed the same way, not in opposite directions. The comb vore, or furrow, is a shallow one ploughed in the same direction, and next before the deeper all vore, in ploughing which latter the soil is turned up upon the smaller one, so as to make a good comb or ridge to the 'bat,' Reports Provinc. (1895).

6. An unturned ridge or balk left in ploughing.

Som. Reports Agric. (1793-1813) 158. Dev.¹ Cor. Land broken for wheat is . . . ploughed so as to leave here and there . . . a very narrow rib called a comb, QUILLER-COUCH Hist. Polperro (1871); Cor.¹

11. The line or edge where the upright bank of a hedge ends, and the top begins.

w.Som.¹ The fences mostly consist of high banks with bushes and brambles growing on them. A great deal of the hedger's art consists in setting up the bank so as to keep this line well defined—to make a geod koa'm tūe un [to it]. In all boundary hedges, the owner's exact bounds extend by custom to dree veo't o'a'f dhu koa m u dhu aj [three feet off the comb of the hedge]; that is, to a line plumbd down from three feet off the top outer edge of the bank. Dev. It is often a matter of discussion where this comb is precisely situated; but it is gen. considered to be an imaginary line on the top of the slope of the bank—by no means the centre of the hedge—many of which are double, and all have a comb on each side, Reports Provinc. (1895); Not a hound has touched the comb of that hedge Memoir Russell (1883) xi.

12. The ridge of a roof.

w.Som.¹ Called also the koa m u dh-aew'z [comb of the house]. Very common. Dev. Reports Provinc. (1895).

COME, sb. Sc. Growth, act of vegetation.

Sc. There's a come in the grund [there is a considerable degree of vegetation] (JAM.).

COME, sb. Sc. Nhb. Yks. Chs. War. Wor. Also written cum (JAM.). A crook, bend, curve; the angle which a spade, hoe, or other implement makes with the ground.

Lnk. (JAM.), Nhb., w.Yks. (J.W.). Chs. If the mouth and handle are almost in a line the spade is said to have 'very little come'; if they make a considerable angle, the spade has 'a good deal of come.' For shovelling up soil a spade with as much come as possible is best, as the workman does not require to stoop so low. s.Chs. The implement is said to have more or less come according as the angle is more or less obtuse.

Hence Comin, adj. Of a scythe, &c.: narrow, not at a sufficient angle.

s.War. (E.S.) Wor. This scythe is set on the sned too comin [the blade is set with the point too near to the handle], ib.

CONJUROR, sb. Yks. Cor. One able to exorcise the devil or lay ghosts.

n.Yks.¹ The power involved here is, or was until lately, held to reside in the clergy; and I have myself been applied to by a woman, who was sane enough in most points, to lay certain spirits which pertinaciously disturbed her: one the ghost of a deceased 'minster'; another the evil one himself. But the power of the Church-priests, or clergymen of the Church of England, was held to be light, or almost nothing, in comparison with that of the Roman Catholic priests. See Ord's Hist of Cleveland, p. 301. Cor. When witchcraft is suspected, the person overlooked has immediate recourse to the conjurer, QUILLER-COUCH Hist. Polperro (1871) 146.

[Jewis exorcistis or coniureris, WYCLIF (1382) Acts xix. 13.]

w.Mid. A line is drawn on the ground, enclosing a rectangular space about a yard long, by half a yard wide. At the other end of the ground a similar figure is drawn, so that the two longest sides face one another at about ten or twelve yards distant. The players are divided into two sides, one side supplying two bowlers, who, standing behind the 'rings,' throw a 'cat' into the ring at the other end of the ground. Two batsmen, with sticks, belonging to the opposing party try to hit the 'cat' away as it approaches them, and if successful, score runs as at cricket. When the 'cat' falls within the 'ring' the batsman of that end is 'out.' Still common (W.P.M.).

CONK, sb. and *v.*¹ Yks. I.Ma. War. Wor. Wil. Slang. Also written konk e.Yks.¹ w.Yks. [kɒŋk.]

1. A snail-shell; the shell which breaks its opponent in a boys' game; also pl. the game itself (see below). Cf. conger, *sb.*²

e.Yks.¹ In the boys' game of conkers the apexes of two shells are pressed together until one is broken, the owner of the other being the victor. War.³ se.Wor.¹, Shr.¹, e.An.¹, Nrf.¹ Som. SWEETMAN Wincanton Gl. (1885).

2. pl. A game played with horse-chestnuts threaded on a string. Cf. cob-nut, cobblety-cuts, oblionker.

Chs.¹ It is played by two boys who sit face to face astride of a form or a log of timber. If a piece of turf (peat dried for fuel) can be produced so much the better. One boy lays his chestnut upon the turf, and the other strikes at it with his chestnut; and they go on striking alternately till one chestnut splits the other. The chestnut which remains unhurt is then 'conqueror of one.' A new chestnut is substituted for the broken one, and the game goes on. Whichever chestnut now proves victorious becomes 'conqueror of two,' and so on, the victorious chestnut adding to its score all the previous winnings. The chestnuts are often artificially hardened by placing them up the chimney, or carrying them in the warm pocket; and a chestnut which has become conqueror of a considerable number acquires a value in school-boys' eyes, and I have frequently known them to be sold, or exchanged for other toys. s.Chs.¹ War.² Let's go and play at conkers. Wil.¹ w.Som.¹

3. The horse-chestnut which breaks its opponent at the game of 'conkers'; hence gen. a horse-chestnut.

Chs.¹, s.Chs.¹ s.Not. So called by the boys, who bore holes through them and hang them on pieces of string, and then challenge one another to try which can break the other's conquer by striking it with his own. 'Come on! Hev yer got any conkers!' (J.P.K.). s.Lin. Let's pick up all them conkers (F.H.W.). Oxf. (S.H.); Oxf.¹ MS. add. Wil. A hole is bored in a nut and a string run through it. The boys take it in turn to hold or hit. The nut that smashes the other is 'conk' and counts all its defeated adversary's score as its own (G.E.D.); Wil.¹ Som. SWEETMAN Wincanton Gl. (1885). w.Som.¹ I saw two boys in my grounds throwing stones at a horse-chestnut tree. As soon as they saw me, before I had spoken, both said at once, 'Plai z-r, aay aan u-bún aat een daew'n dhu kaung kurz' [Please, sir, I have not been hitting down the chestnuts].

4. Comb. Conker-tree, the horse-chestnut, Aesculus Hippocastanum. Chs.¹, s.Chs.¹, w.Som.¹

5. v. To play the game of 'conkers' either with snail-shells or with horse-chestnuts.

s.Not. Hev yer got any conkers? Ah'll conquer yer (J.P.K.). Som. There used to be 'conquering' with snail-shells: Southey says 'our schoolboy sports, that of "conquering" with snail-shells. . . . The snail-shells (not tenantless) were pressed point against point until one was broken in,' DOWDEN Southey, 9.

COPSIL, sb. Shr. Also written copsal Shr.² [ko'psil, ko'psl]

1. Obs. A wedge for keeping the coulter of an old-fashioned wooden plough in its place and at a proper angle to the beam. Also called cop-wedge.

Shr.¹ The cepsil, or, as it was sometimes called, the cop-wedge, was gen. attached to the beam of the plough by a short chain to prevent its being lost. When it was taken out of the hole in the beam, through which the coulter passed, the latter would be quite loose and could be removed at pleasure for repairs. The cepsil in fastening the coulter was vertical, or nearly so, to the beam. In modern iron-ploughs a horizontal cramp secured by a screw and nut on the opposite side of the beam fulfils the office of the old cepsil. Cepsils of this kind fell out of use when iron ploughs became general, about 1835-1840.

2. The cramps on the plough-beam, which by means of screws and nuts, secure and adjust the wheels of a plough. Shr.¹

3. A piece of iron welded to the end of the plough-beam, perforated and furnished with pins, for adjusting the width and regulating the draught of the plough. sb.

8. Part of the furniture of a pack-saddle; see below.

Som. (W.F.R.) w.Som. 1 There are two kinds, long crooks and short crooks. The former consist of two long poles bent in a half circle of about eighteen inches in diameter, but with one end much longer than the other. A pair of these bent poles are kept about two feet apart and parallel to each other by five or more rungs. A frame so constructed forms one crook, and a pair of these pairs are slung on the pack-saddle pannier-wise. When in position the long ends of the crooks are upright, and are at least three feet above the horse's back. Being over five feet asunder, a very large quantity of hay, straw, or corn can be loaded on a pack-horse. Short crooks are of the same description, but smaller in capacity and with rungs closer together. They are for heavier materials, such as hard firewood, building stones, &c. It used to be as common to say 'I'll send a horse and crooks' as it now is to say 'horse and cart.' Both kinds are now very rarely seen. Dev. The moormen most commonly convey their peat, and all things else, on what is called a crook, BRAY Desc. Soc. (1884) II. 233. n.Lin. Obs. Shr. The cross-cloth, together with the 'skull-cap' and 'plucker-down', formed the head-gear of an infant a century ago. The skull-cap was a tight-fitting cap of linen which went over the cross-cloth; to this was attached the plucker-down—an invention designed to keep the child from throwing its head back. It consisted of two linen bands, which, being secured to the cap at one end, were at the other fastened to the shoulders of the child's dress, thus keeping the head in position. 'They'll be awa' now, they's crying oop this ha'f-hour.' (17) Sc. Monthly Mag. (1800) I. 322. (18) Ir. (G.M.H.) Shr. Miss Jackson's MSS clearly distinguish between 'cutting the neck' at the end of the reaping, and 'crying the mare' at the end of the harvest, which previous writers seem to have confounded together. Crying, calling, or shouting the mare is a ceremony performed by the men of that farm which is the first in any parish or district to finish the harvest. . . . All the men assemble in the stackyard, or better, on the highest ground on the farm, and there shout a dialogue—preceding it by a grand 'Hip, hip, hip, hurrah.' . . . There were of course variations in the details in different places, but it was universally practised, and though dying out, is by no means extinct. . . . At Pulverbatch, Christopher Sandford . . . observed in 1871 that 'they cried the mar' right well this 'ear,' BURNE Flk-Lore (1883) 373-4; Shr.¹ Shr.² When a farmer has ended his reaping and the wooden bottle is passing merrily round, the reapers form themselves into two bands, and commence the following dialogue in loud shouts, or rather a kind of chant, at the utmost pitch of their voice. . . . 'I have her, I have her.' 'What hast thee?' 'A mare, a mare,' &c. In the se.Shr. . . . the last few stalks of the wheat are left standing; all the reapers throw their sickles, and he who cuts it off cries 'I have her.' . . . In 1835 'they cryden the mar awhile I was thure, becoss yo sin we'den done harrast fust' (s.v. Mare). (19) w.Som.¹ A bunch of ears is tied together called the neck. Dev. NEILL Idyls (1892) 123 nw.Dev.¹ Dev., Cor. After the wheat is all cut on most farms, the harvest people have a custom of 'crying the neck.' . . . An old man . . . goes round to the shocks and sheaves, and picks out a little bundle of all the best ears he can find; this bundle he ties up very neat and trim. . . . This is called 'the neck.' . . . The reapers . . . stand round in a circle. The person with 'the neck' stands in the centre, grasping it with both his hands. He first stoops and holds it near the ground, and all the men forming the ring take off their hats, stooping . . . towards the ground. . . . Then all begin at once, in a very prolonged and harmonious tone, to cry, 'The neck!' at the same time slowly raising themselves upright, and elevating their arms and hats above their heads; the person with the neck also raising it on high. This is done three times. They then change their cry to 'We yen! we yen!' . . . One of them then gets 'the neck,' and runs as hard as he can down to the farmhouse . . . The object of crying 'the neck' is to give notice . . . of the end of the harvest, and the meaning of 'we yen' is 'we have ended.' The neck is gen. hung up in the farmhouse, HUNT Pop. Rom w.Eng. (1865) 385-6, ed. 1896. (20) Shr.² (s.v. Mare). (21) Cor. What d'ee mean by crying stale fish at that rate? 'Q.' Wandering Heath (1895) 11. (22) Shr. BURNE Flk-Lore (1883) 526.
